

I cannot in good conscience allow the FCC to pass a rule that guts net neutrality without expressing my dismay at the prospect of an internet that is no longer free and open. The name of the proposed regulation, Restoring Internet Freedom, is worthy of Big Brother's propaganda spiel. Internet service providers should simply not be allowed to regulate access to network sites any more than phone companies should be able to dictate what person one can speak to. If I want to use Amazon Prime rather than iTunes, it should be my choice, and my choice alone, unconstrained by whatever contract my ISP might have with one or the other company. If you would be outraged were Verizon to limit your ability to communicate with someone who has an AT&T phone account, or charge more to connect with someone with a Sprint account, then you should feel the same sense of outrage at getting rid of net neutrality. Do not break the system.
